

Omit as much as half a page

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN.

As long as slavery exists in the South and fanaticism in the North we may expect to hear ourselves abused and our institutions misrepresented. It is natural that those men should denounce, by the authority of, what they have the audacity to term, "a higher law", an institution which self interest compelled them to abolish. Do answer their very conscientious denunciations is beneath the dignity of a Southern man. A thousand Mrs Stows may spring up like willows weeping over woes which live only in romance - the whole North may kneel at the shrine where fanaticism sacrifices to its own loathsome desires - the "old world" while she erects no statue to charity in her own Pantheon may appeal through her Duchesses and Countesses to the women of America to exert that influence peculiar to women in behalf of the abolition of slavery, but our only reply should be interpreted from a silent contempt.